A kid with golden hands. 5

- Hey Ben, can you tell us what happened with your team when you got into the storm?

In a tiny living room, fourteen landlords were sitting around a big oval table with a map of the Atlantic ocean on it. There was also an old man around fifty years old without the right hand. This man was a former trading ship captain who was telling about his encouraging life in a sea.

- I don't even want to remember. It was a living nightmare. All I can tell you is that out of nineteen people there were only two left - me and a kid of a French officer who went with us to watch the trade.

- But how did you manage to come back alive and with the shipment?

- All thanks to kid, actually. At first we weren't able to break the ice simply because he didn't know English and was very stubborn when I asked him to work! But one day he went sick, and I did my best to recover him. Half of the herbs were spent on him, but it was a small cost for saving a life.

The captain took a sip from his cup of coffee and continued:

- Right after his recovery, we've met a bigger problem. A group of pirates' ships were going towards us! I was completely broken and went to my room to pray, but then I heard cannons. A lot of cannons. They were shooting, but not at our ship. I went outside - the pirates have turned away! The boy somehow managed to load up all the weapons and make them able to shoot. That day I realised - a journey is best measured in friends rather than miles.
