A Biking Trip

Last July my friends and I, feeling awfully bored, decided to try something completely new for us - travelling by ourselves. It was Nastya, my childhood best friend, who suggested this. At first I ~~hadn't~~ wasn't keen on the idea - we couldn't drive, and I hadn't ridden a bike in ages, but my other friend, Anya, insisted that it would be an amazing experience, and added that we still had time to plan everything out. A couple of minutes later I finally agreed, and so the story began.

We decided to cycle to our neighbouring city - it wasn't too long of a trip, but it was enough for us. The day before leaving we prepared the food, the clothes and some money - we weren't sure what to take, and so went with the essentials. The next morning we were ready to go.

The first stop was planned to be at a cafe in the outskirts of our city, which was approximately three hours into the trip. When we finally reached the cafe, Nastya said what I'd been thinking the entire time: "Maybe we've overestimated ourselves?". "Nonsense", said Anya. She was the most stubborn person you could ever meet, and so we just went with it.

Problems started an hour later, when my bike started making weird noises. We couldn't find the reason for that, no matter how much time we spent on it, and, since it was getting dark, Anya suggested that we stop at the nearest hotel. But just when we had almost reached our destination, one of my bike's pedals just stopped dead. Obviously, I fell right down, but it wasn't too bad - just a bunch of bruises and scratches. My bike, on the other hand, was done for.

After that Anya finally called her dad to pick us up, since we hadn't even left the city yet, and Nastya sat down trying to fix my bike. She didn't succeed, but I appreciated the sentiment. "Maybe a journey is better ~~measured~~ measured in friends rather than miles", I said, feeling awkward that I was the reason we had to go back. My friends just looked at me and went in for a hug.
