Under the heating Mexican sun

John was driving his big, well-equipped car on a tiny Mexican road, thinking about a challenging trip he had started a week ago. It included driving all the way from Houston to Panama. Perhaps, living a calm life in a big city in Texas was just too boring for him. Suddenly, he recalled that one turn he had forgotten to make about 30 minutes ago: "Damn it! Hope there are other turns ahead, John" He kept driving straight, really not going to turn back only to waste 30 more minutes. Suddenly, his car stopped. Unfortunately, John's dreams were correct. He ran out of fuel.

When the unlucky traveller left the vehicle, he found himself standing in the middle of nowhere, out of fuel, hungry and with no Internet access. As only he thought it couldn't get any worse, he heard a distant howl. Staring into the horizon with the eyes full of horror he saw a pack of wolves running at him. Someone behind him shouted: "Bend down!" Then two loud shots scared the pack away. Turning around, John saw a happy man with a shotgun. The man spoke in poor English: "What are you doing here alone?" The traveller told him the whole story, then the Mexican introduced himself as Diego and as he had some fuel in his car, helped the unlucky American. After that, Diego suggested to visit his hometown a few miles away. John replied: "But I'm on my trip and I really don't want to slow down". Putting a hand on John's shoulder, Diego said: "You know, sometimes a journey is best measured in friends rather than miles"

Two cheerful men were driving to a small town under the heating Mexican sun...
